But he is a necessary part of the film. Even though Mani Ratnam has another character who clearly does have a similar but somehow unrelated feeling and does have the opportunity to voice his feeling all the way, it wouldn't be a Mani Ratnam movie if that were the case. Mani Ratnam has been in films before where the character didn't have such an obvious chance, and is a leelas-like reaction to the situation. And when he isn't that, he is still deeply committed to the subject and longingly dedicated to the subject. I think he is one of those rare directors who really gets the human chemistry of relationships, and he certainly does in this film, and I am glad that he gives this character the special attention and poignance that he does in the book. In fact, the film could have taken a few more stabs at human psychology. For instance, the character Chitti has a soft side too in his love for his elder brother. And at the same time, Chitti has a slightly abrasive personality, and you would expect him to be a bit mean. But it's as if he doesn't have the chance to be mean to Kannan too, because they have this undercurrent friendship, and that is why he doesn't let Kannan go through with the ill-advised suicide attempt. But I'm sure as the movie goes on, we all will get a closer look at this same melodrama. What's interesting about Mani's later day film making is that we are introduced to the same set of characters repeatedly over the years. Despite so many more movies to look back, and more characters to meet, he yet captures the same precious moments of a hero, becoming more a father like figure, as he gives him a second chance to keep the love alive, rediscover the lost love, and focus on the failures of life. It is like the poor guy spends most of his life getting his heart broken and now not going through any such thing. And if the excess baggage of love gets in the way, he just keeps getting new love partners that happen to fit into some emotionally acceptable slot in his life.

But again, thats how i interpret them. Watch these movies and try to understand what the fuck the director was thinking in his head that made him to so much. it would have been interesting if he had said what he was trying to say with a quirkly manner, because thats always a lot more revealing than and just a straight forward talk. Thank God he doesnt do that. He shows you just enough to show you whats there. YEH! thats how i read them. My friends and i would call each other and discuss what each read and try to understand what he was thinking. But the plots are simple enough to not need such elaborate theoretical explanations and hence a whole realm of interpretation is not needed to explain them. And this doesnt mean i dont have ideas about his films. But thats only because his movies dont demand them. As a producer, i have a responsibility to market to as many people as possible. I dont want my movies to just appeal to a small intellectual crowd. Thats why they arent supposed to appeal to them. As long as they have simple and relatable stories, dont make convoluted plots, have good and fun dialogue, and some strong characters that are engrossing, i dont think it matters all that much if they dont need any complex explanations about it. Nor do the directors need to justify themselves by stating that they dont want to. They should just get on with their work and if it was good enough, then itll find a wide audience. Just remember, in a Mani Ratnam movie, good characters and strong performances is what really matters not the inter-textual analysis and the intellectual explanations of every twist and turn. Its that simple. 5ec8ef588b
